APPENDIX

- (1) Waste water from the kraft mill, gathered by three separate sewers, will be discharged into the Fraser River together with those natural river solids contained in the mill water supply abstracted initially from the Fraser River. The general sewer receives waste water which contains relatively uncontaminated effluents. In the event of a process spill into the general sewer, its contents are diverted to a dump basin by an automatic valve which is controlled by a conductivity sensing element.
- The caustic sewer and acid sewer gather those alkaline and acidic waste waters, respectively, which are released from various parts of the mill, including the bleach plant, unbleached-pulp thickener, recausticising area, and power boiler. After partial neutralization with lime mud, the acidic waste water is mixed with the alkaline waste water so as to complete the neutralization prior to entry in the biochemical treatment basin. After biochemical oxidation, the treated waste water is combined with the contents of the general sewer and thence discharged into an improved lagoon, where they mix with surface- and ground-water drainage.
- An excavated channel leading from the improved lagoon conveys the combined discharge to a dispersal channel, where it is mixed with river water and discharged into the main stream of the Fraser River.
- (2) These flows refer to mill waste water and exclude storm-water flows, which will increase the amounts shown.
- (3) Natural river sediments are excluded from these concentrations; suspended solids before treatment comprise cellulose fibres plus insoluble salts from the water-treatment plant. Some of the dissolved cellulose material will be precipitated by the biochemical treatment.
- (4) Natural river sediments and river dissolved solids are excluded from these concentrations. Concentrations after treatment refer to the point of discharge before river mixing.

- Solids consist of sodium salts, mainly sodium chloride, humus, calcium sulphate, aluminum hydroxide, and cellulose fibre.
- (5) Refers to pH before entry to the biochemical basin. The acidic waste water has a pH of 2.2, which is partially neutralized with lime mud. Alkaline waste water of pH 11.2 is used to complete the neutralization.
- (6) During winter cold spells, the effluent temperature will drop to an average of 45° F.
- (7) Based on average manpower in plant operations and 70 per cent removed during treatment in the biochemical basin.
- (8) The concentration of hydrogen sulphide will be less than 0.1 p.p.m. Mercaptan and organic sulphide concentrations will each be less than 0.4 p.p.m. Free chlorine will be less than 0.1 p.p.m. Resin soaps will be less than 4 p.p.m.
